change in the Russian plans, and that after all General Kuropatkin will got put his campaign to the final test by giving battle to the Japanese about Kal-Chow. In this he is, according to expert opinion here, wise. Every advantage of position in case of a general engagement would be with the Japanese. In case of Russian defeat, which is regarded as probable, the chances would be largely against his being able to fall back without enormous loss, while had he beaten the Japanese, the advantage gained would hve been moral rather than material.

Witnessed the Affair.

Miss Alberta Burns, who is employed in a building a block below the Chamber of Commerce, saw the desperate struggle between the couple from her office window. Swayse, she says, made two attempts to throw the woman from the window. Once he lifted her by her feet and succeeded in getting part of her body through the window, when she broke away from him. Then he grabbed her about the waist and again tried to throw her to the street. Again she broke away. Then he attacked the woman and pounded her about the head, finally drawing his revolver and shooting her. Swayse then crowled upon the window, and, Miss Burns says, let his body down until his feet seemed to rest on something, possibly a narrow ledge, a few feet below the window.

Here he hung for a few seconds, then his head fell back, his hands lost their grip and he whirled through out of Miss Burns's range of vision.
